GREEN EU

Goal #11: European programs and youth organizations

Rome, Italy

24-26 September 2024

About the Project

In the European Union, addressing climate change and promoting civic participation are fundamental priorities that go hand in hand. The EU recognizes that effectively tackling climate change requires the active engagement of citizens, local communities, civil society, and various stakeholders. The EU has established a comprehensive climate policy framework aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions, increasing energy efficiency, and transitioning to a sustainable and low-carbon economy. Key components include the European Green Deal, the Fitfor55 Package, and the EU Climate Law, which set ambitious goals to achieve climate neutrality by 2050. Civic participation is encouraged through public consultations and engagement with civil society organizations to shape and implement these policies. Within this framework, the project GREEN EU – Building European Resilience to Climate Change Impacts, funded by the EU's CERV program, is situated.

The project includes the following activities:

- Conducting a transnational survey involving at least 450 people from 18 EU countries to assess the level of awareness and understanding of climate change factors and challenges among the general public. The survey results will provide evidence-based insights that will enable the consortium to provide a set of bottom-up recommendations to support policy decisions.
- Organizing a series of transnational and national events focusing on various aspects of environmental and climate issues, such as the circular economy, biodiversity conservation, renewable energy, sustainable infrastructure, and adaptation measures, always relating them to the theme of civic engagement.
